OF THE 15TH CENTURY | One of the precursors of the Ragusan poets was SiSko Mencetic (1457-1527). He had an especial talent for composing those love songs which the troubadours and their joglars brought to the world. The Provençal school had declined since the end of the 13th century, but its influence reigned for a long time in the palace of Alphonse V at Milan, where that king spent his exile. In Italy Petrarch was the most illustrious representative of this conventional lyricism, and he had many imitators. As has been pointed out, Ragusa had too extended a commerce and too intimate relationships with distant countries to remain untouched by foreign customs and civilizations. Provençal poetry was not slow in penetrating there. Jagid by a comparison of the poems of Petrarch and his disciples (Petrarchists) with those of the Dalmatian writers has shown...
