The whole is done according to a comprehensive plan to ensure the continuity of the Teak supply. The woods are exploited with the aid of private industry under the supervision of the government. In this work the ax is used exclusively. This must be a clumsy implement in that the head of iron is fastened to the handle with leather thongs. The logs are sawn into planks by hand. In ava every man is his own builder and labor is cheap. Sawmills however will come in time. The process of cultivation is what the Germans call waldfeldbau, a combination of forestry and agriculture. The Teak seeds are planted in rows three meters apart at the beginning of the west monsoon when the soil is wet and soft. Then the soil between the rows is worked and sown to field crops. The superfluous plants are weeded out and the earth is heaped up around the plants, and several field crops are grown between the rows for a period of 15 or 20 months until the Teak reaches a height of five meters, when it is left to its fate. The natives who do the work are allowed all the field produce, which is usually corn or rice, and a premium of about 35 florins per hectare on condition that they furnish all seed for the crops. This is payable however in proportion to the growth and prosperity of the...
