It is his wish that what is written alone shall be considered, as though it were a voice speaking from the dark. But one remark respecting his tone seems permissible, and that is required. Throughout the pamphlet there is a positiveness of assertion which, unexplained, might prove repugnant to the feelings of thinking men and women, even if not ridiculous in their view. When Congress, with all its patriotic and highly educated ability, and when reconstruction is its chief and special business, makes such slow headway, for any one man (and he too remote from the discussions of Washington, as well as immersed in the cares and toils of a private business demanding his first attention) to declare, in all positiveness, this should be done, and that ought not to be, and this third thing must be, while that fourth no longer can be - seeming thus to assume to himself both right and ability to settle what the ablest men of the nation are so cautious about - such a tone must prove nothing else than pitiable, if the seeming assumption be real. However apparent, the writer desires in advance to disavow its reality, and to direct the attention of the reader to the fact that all the should s, and must s and ought-to-be s, even if not necessities for national adoption, are necessities to the statement of an entire scheme. But that the writer does roost solemnly...
