Here a plastic film of separate, minute solid particles of basic copper sulfate covers each oil drop. Read Jour. Chem. Soc, 91, 2001 (1907) for further directions and comment. Exp. 101. Adsorption Films.--Peptize air-dried cellulose nitrate (11 per cent nitrogen) by a mixture of 1 part of amyl acetate and 3 parts of benzene, making it about a 2 per cent solution. Pour enough of this into a small beaker to give a layer nearly 1 cm. deep. With a pipette, add a very large drop, or globule, of water and watch it for a few minutes. A visible film quickly forms. Gently tilt the beaker and distort the drop by rolling it around. Wrinkles in the film demonstrate its toughness and elasticity. This film of cellulose nitrate has lowered the surface tension of its solvent and thus concentrated at the interface. Similar films may form in other instances but may lack visibility because of an equality of indices of refraction of all the substances present. This experiment supports Bancroft's theory, in this instance, at least. If it fails use much more benzene. Froth Concentration of a Dye.--Another example of the concentration of dissolved substances at surfaces is found in the frothing of an aqueous solution of methyl violet. Here the interface is between water and air. Miss Benson (Jour....
