From the debris of other interments, this would seem to be a typical arrangement of the pottery, though the number of specimens was unusually great. The whole of the remains, with the skull, are shown in Pl. xii. 1. III. 2, a cist tomb on the N.E. side of the tumulus contained a spoon of shell, a bronze needle (?) or piercer, and a large two-handled vase xiv. 5, on the body of which was scratched a rudely-shaped C Tumulus IV. was another ridge with three rows of coffins south of III. At the south end of the middle and longest row, a grave, IV. 4, contained a long, pointed two-handled vase (see Pl. xii. 2 and xiv. 8), with an indistinct hieraticodemotic inscription painted upon it in black. The coffin was of white-faced terra-cotta, not painted. Next to it,...
